Clients are assisted by social workers in dealing with challenges that arise in ordinary life. They frequently assist clients who are dealing with challenges related to parental substance misuse, neglect, abuse, domestic violence, mental health, and mental health.

Social workers deal with certain categories of clients, such as children, the elderly, and families in distress, to assist them in resolving their issues. Adult or child social workers are the most common specialisations. Because clients may be vulnerable or in challenging situations, social workers must be able to function under duress and understand the perspectives of others.
