As a family support worker, you'll provide practical assistance as well as emotional support to families dealing with short- or long-term problems. Typically, you'll work for the social services departments of local governments or nonprofit organisations.

Your main responsibility is to support service users by empowering them to face various obstacles, decreasing problems and hazards, and, in some situations, ensuring that children can stay with their families.

JOB RESPONSIBILITY

A close-up photograph of a person's hand placing a yellow letter tile with the letter 'L' onto a word game board. The board is a light-colored fabric with a circular pattern. Several words are already formed using yellow letter tiles: 'ADOPTION' is at the top, and 'FAMILY' is in the center. Numerous other letter tiles are scattered across the board, some forming partial words like 'MAY', 'BAX', and 'LICK'. The tiles are small, rectangular, and have a slightly textured surface. The background is a neutral, light-colored surface.

Because you may be dealing with delicate and difficult situations such as loss and neglect, the job can be emotionally draining. It can also be difficult and confrontational, especially if a family does not want you to be involved. Because the family may not be ready to engage with you in some circumstances, not all interactions will be successful. However, assisting families in overcoming a wide range of problems and adversity means that your job is both varied and gratifying.
