Course overview

Studies have shown that there are at least 30,000 people in the UK with a severe learning disability who experience behaviour that challenges. Although this is the case, these are not the only group of people who may experience such behaviour, particularly with regard to children.

Many children tend to display aspects of behaviour that challenges at some point, but eventually develop the necessary skills to grow out of this. However, some children (especially those with a learning disability, sensory issues or a mental health condition) do not develop these skills and are therefore unable to make sure that their needs are met, which ultimately leads to behaviour that challenges. Peter McGill, Tizard Centre, University of Kent.

This course will provide learners with a detailed understanding of behaviour that challenges in children, including how such behaviour can be assessed and the kind of avoidance techniques that can help minimise the effects of behaviour that challenges. Learners will also look at how different coexisting conditions, such as a learning disability, a mental health condition, and sensory issues and autism, can impact on behaviour that challenges and how to support those children who experience these complex behaviours.

Who is suitable?

This qualification is aimed at anyone who wishes to develop an in-depth knowledge of behaviour that challenges in children in order to progress into related employment in education or health and social care settings. Anyone who currently works in the education and health and social care sectors would also benefit from the course, as well as anyone with a personal need for or interest in more detailed knowledge of behaviour that challenges in children. This qualification is suitable for learners aged 16 or above.
